This concentration resulted in an increase in overall lipid droplet area as expected, while pretreatment with the higher concentration of oleic acid resulted in a similar increase in LD size with a lower peak. This change could be due to two factors, the increased number of LDs and a change in the composition of the LDs themselves. With regards to the first possibility, it seems that HFD causes an increase in LD number. However, since no reduction in TEM lipid droplet area was seen following treatment, this has not been confirmed. Furthermore, since our treatment group showed no change in LD size, this could be due to the change in LD composition. LDs often contain a unique set of lipids, including but not limited to: triacylglycerols, sterols, and phospholipids. Under normoxic conditions, a large proportion of the LD membrane contains cardiolipin and phospholipids such as phosphatidylethanolamine, while in a more hypoxic environment, cardiolipin is reduced and phosphatidylethanolamine accumulates \[[@B32-ijms-17-00817]\]. Another important component of LDs is tocopherols. Tocopherols are oxidation-sensitive vitamin E compounds that are involved in the antioxidant response of the cell to changes in environmental oxygen levels. The high concentration of oleic acid in this study has also been shown to promote cell growth and therefore we can assume that LDs under these conditions also contain an increased concentration of lipids such as cholesterol or alpha-tocopherol that could induce LD growth. The increase in LD size is commonly seen following a change in the concentration of fatty acids. H&E staining of lymph node tissue showed the size of lymph node cells to increase as well. However, when we looked at the microscopic 1cdb36666d
